1. Consultants

Mr. Dulles raised the question of consultants who had been employed but never used. He asked Colonel Edwards, Mr. Carey and Mr. Saunders to study the possibility of developing a "twilight area," i.e., get a name check on a proposed consultant which would enable the Agency to talk to the man without actually signing him up. He suggested that such an arrangement should cover a period of about six months. Mr. Wisner expressed ~~some~~ concern over the tendency to allow some consultants to control the actions of projects with which they are connected rather than having them assist the Agency in working up a project.

2. Remarks to the Press

Mr. Dulles, citing a case where ^{an} ~~some~~ official of CIA made derogatory remarks to the press regarding a private intelligence organization, warned against such actions. He recommended treating these private intelligence organizations in a humorous fashion and letting them "die on the vine." In cases of any doubt where press representatives ask for information, he directed that the facts be passed on to [REDACTED]

3. Inspector General

Mr. Dulles stated that there was a tendency in the Agency to discourage employees from going to the Inspector General with complaints. This tendency was wrong. Employees should be allowed to contact the Inspector General without fear of antagonizing their immediate supervisors. Mr. Kirkpatrick stated that he looked upon his office as the safety valve of the Agency where the employees could "blow off steam" inside the organization rather than expressing themselves outside. He advised that a summary of all the individual cases that he had covered was being prepared and would soon be sent to the three Deputies. Ninety percent of the complaints resulted from poor supervision by Branch Chiefs and above. He mentioned also that with the new personnel ceiling there would be cuts and that because of the tendency in the past to give high ratings on Personnel Evaluation Reports it was going to be difficult to dismiss some of the mediocre employees. He asked that the Assistant Directors stress to Branch Chiefs the necessity for making these reports accurate.

4. Staff Work

General Cabell remarked that the staffing of papers has improved very much.

5. Nixon Briefing

General Cabell stated that Vice President Nixon had been very pleased with the briefing and had asked that all concerned be complimented on the excellent way in which it had been planned.

6. Travel of Agency Personnel

7. Trip of Colonel Baird

Colonel Baird remarked that on his recent trip to the Far East he received universal complimentary reports on the training of Communications personnel. He also noted that in the Far East the average Case Officer is sent overseas without proper training.
